After witnessing a dozen or so court trials in the moving pictures we are convinced that the fellows who stage the plays ought to hire a few good lawyers as assistant directors.

FARM TO FARM

(By BYRON DYER, County Agent)

Cattail millet gives more grain per acre than any crop we have to use as a temporary pasture, declares Brooks Woodcock. Mr. Woodcock says that a few small patches can be cut off and planted around the barn that will support through the summer all the pigs and calves an average farmer raises.

A. P. Belcher reasoned that hogs need grain the year round. However, feeding them corn from the crib was a little too expensive this spring. To solve this problem he decided to use oats and then follow the oat crop with peas to turn under as a soil builder. The oats carried the pigs until he could put them in some early corn and peanuts.

Corn fertilizer can be grown during the winter months if the results of turning under vetch and Austrian winter peas in the spring on corn land found as practiced on John Powell's farm is a fair example. Mr. Powell has a field of corn that looks like it had been fertilized when, as a matter of fact, it has only had the green manure crop turned under.

One way of marketing steers is to swap them for heifers and thereby build up your foundation herd of cattle, according to Raymond F. Stainback. Mr. Stainback started his herd of Herefords with a purebred steer, and from time to time adds a good blooded heifer, usually by swapping a steer for it. The range this herd runs on has carpet grass and wire grass on it. Mr. Stainback found that this did not fatten the cattle as he thought it should. He added some common lespedeza to the mixture to produce the fattening ration.

That advice we used to get to work hard and save our money, has turned out to be foolish after all. For the fellow who worked hard and saved his money now has to support the guy who is being taught the government owes him a living.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to express our heartfelt thanks to our friends for their kindnesses shown us during the illness and death of our dear husband and father, Lester Collins. May God bless each of you in our prayer.

MRS. LESTER COLLINS AND FAMILY.
